The difficult problem of the ultimate origin of the word is complicated by variation of the ending in the Romanic languages. In addition to espinache, -age, OF. had also espinoche (still in dial. use), -oce, = med.L. spinochia, and espinarde, espinar (F. épinard), = Prov. espinarc, med.L. spinarium, -argium. Pg. exhibits the further variant espinafre. By older writers the stem of these forms was supposed to be L. spina, in allusion to the prickly seeds of a common species. De Vic considers the various forms to be adoptions of Arab. isfināj, Pers. isfānāj, ispānāk, aspanākh (Richardson), but it is doubtful whether these are really native words. It is difficult to explain either the Romanic or the Oriental forms from the synonymous Hispanicum olus recorded from the 16th cent. and represented by older F. herbe d'Espaigne (Cotgrave).]

SPLENETIC—SQUOYLE.

By HENRY BRADLEY, Hon. D.Litt.

PREFATORY NOTE.

This Part of the Dictionary contains 3243 Main words, 1106 Special Combinations explained under these, 1498 Obvious Combinations, and 710 Subordinate entries of obsolete or variant forms; in all 6557 words. Of the Main words 599 are marked † as obsolete, and 93 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Dr. Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following figures :—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic', and Suppl.	'Century' Dict., and Suppl.	Here.
Words recorded	499	2357	3140	6557
Words illustrated by quotations	408	756	736	5840
Number of quotations	2003	1527	2603	39509

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson is 1528.

The following notes give some account of the separate sections of which this part is composed.

Splenetic—Spring. This section includes only a small number of words that occur in Old English—spoke, spoon, sprawl, spread, spring. The words of Teutonic origin that first appear in Middle English are numerous; the early history of many of these is obscure, but several, as splice, splint, splinter, split, splitter, were probably adopted from Dutch or Low German; during the nineteenth century Dutch has also supplied spook and spoor. The French element of the English vocabulary is represented by the important words spoil, sport, spousal, spouse, which are all ultimately of Latin etymology. Among the words derived directly from Latin are spoliation, sponsor, spontaneous. The Greek derivatives include splenic (with several related terms of pathology and anatomy), spondee, spondyle, sponge, sporadic, spore, and various derivatives from the stems represented by these. Gaelic is scantily represented by spleuchan, sporran, and spreath (corruptly spreagh). There are a considerable number of words of obscure origin, some of which, as splurge, spoffish, spondulicks, spoof, spree, appear to be arbitrary inventions.

Spring—Squoyle. This section comprises, in almost equal portions, the remainder of the words beginning with Sp-, and the whole of those with initial Squ-. The former are predominantly of English origin, and include such words as spring sb. and vb. (which together with derivatives and compounds occupy nearly 30 columns), sprit, sprout, spur, spurn, and spurt. Various others of obscure history may also be of native stock, as sprocket, sprod, spry, spud, spunk. Dutch has contributed springbok, sprue, spruit, and spurrey, possibly also sprinkle and sputter. The geographical name Spruce (Prussia) is the source of spruce (-fir), perhaps also of the adj. spruce. Compared with these the Romanic element is small, being chiefly represented by sprite, spume (with derivatives), spurge, spurious, and spy.

Of the words beginning with Squ- a large proportion are not found outside of English, this combination of sounds being rare in other languages, though occurring to some extent in Latin and represented by skv- or sqv- in the Scandinavian tongues. Those which have an obvious etymology are mainly of Latin origin, and represent either Latin words in squ- or Romanic forms in escu-, esqu- (the latter from earlier ex+qu-). Among those directly based on Latin the chief are squalid, squalor, squama or squame (with squamate, -ose, -ous), squarrose, and squill. French of various dates has contributed squad, squadron, square, squash vb.[1], squat, squeamish, squire, and squirrel.

A number of Squ- words are obviously imitative of sound or action, as squall, squark, squatter vb., squawk, squeak, squeal, squelch, squirm, squish, and a vague feeling of appropriateness may account for such forms as squab, squabble, squail, squander, squeeze, squib, squid, squirt, and squize. In some cases s- has been prefixed to words in qu-, as in squeasy, squench.

In addition to these sources, American Indian tongues have supplied a few words, as squash sb.[2], squaw, and squeteague.

St—Standard. The words included in this section are, with comparatively few exceptions, either of native English or of French origin. Numerically the French derivatives slightly preponderate; but the native words occupy much the larger proportion of the space, mainly because of the multitude of the senses and idiomatic uses of the verb stand, which fills nearly 13 pages. There are one or two Scandinavian words (stack, stacker, staithe), and a few direct Latin and Greek derivatives (stadium, stagnate and its cognates, stalactite, stalagmite, stamen, stamina). Celtic words are entirely absent, as are also adoptions from non-European languages, which in the previous instalments of S have been abundant.

Among the words in this section that are remarkable on account of their sense-development may be mentioned stable adj., stack, staff, stage, stain, stale adj., stall sb.[1] and sb.[2], stalwart (stalworth), stamina, stamp sb. and vb., stand sb. and vb., standard.

Standard—Stead. In this section the greater part of the space is occupied by a small number of important words, with their compounds and derivatives. Of these words the following are of native English origin: staple sb.[1], star sb.[1], starch sb. and vb., stare sb.[1] and vb., stark adj., start sb.[1], sb.[2] and vb., starve vb., stave sb.[1] and vb., stay sb.[1], stead sb. and vb. Of French or Latin etymology are: staumary, staple sb.[2] and adj., state sb. and vb., station, stationer, statistic, statue, stature, status, statute, staunch adj., stay (two sbs. and three verbs); also static (statical, statics) and stavesacre, which are ultimately Greek. The words representing other linguistic elements than Old English, French, or Latin are few and (except the Italian stanza) quite unimportant. From Old Norse there are stang and star sb.[2]; from Greek a few scientific terms, chiefly beginning with staphylo-, stato-, and stauro-. The Slavonic starosta and stchi are unknown to most English readers. Words from Celtic, and words from Oriental, African, and American languages, are entirely absent.

Most of the words of native and Romanic origin enumerated above are remarkable for the interesting development of senses. In the article state sb., the quotations illustrative of obsolete shades of meaning may sometimes be found to supply useful guidance in the interpretation of obscure passages in our early literature. The changes of application in several words, as statics, station, stationer, statistics, statute, are now for the first time fully exhibited. Words of special historical importance are staple sb.[2], star-chamber, statute, statute merchant. New etymological information is given under staniel, staple (three sbs.), starch sb. and vb., stark, start vb., starve vb., stay sbs. and vbs. The current view that stay vb.[1], to bring or come to a stand, to remain, is a developed use of stay vb.[2], to support, has been abandoned for chronological and other reasons, and a different etymology has been proposed. The curious early history of the word starvation has before been given in some dictionaries, but an attempt has been made here to state the actual facts more precisely.

Stead—Stillatim. In this section the words inherited from Old English are very numerous, and with their compounds and derivatives occupy the greater portion of the space. Among them are steal vb. and sb.[1], steam, steed, steek vb.[1] and vb.[2], steel, steep adj., steeple, steer vb. and sbs., stem sb.[1], stench, step sb. and vb., stern adj., steward, stick sb. and vb., stiff, stile, still adj., vb., and adv. Other noteworthy words of native Teutonic origin, though of later formation, are sterling, stickle vb., stickler. The Scandinavian words are steak, steg, stem vb.[1] and vb.[2], stern sb.[2], steven sb.[3] and vb.[3]

There are a few words from Old French, as stencil, stent, stew sbs. and vb., and a somewhat larger number of Latin derivatives, as stellate, stellation, stelliferous, stercoraceous, sterile, stertorous, of some of which the immediate sources are learned words in French. The numerical proportion of words of Greek etymology is somewhat large, but most of these have required only brief treatment, being mainly recent terms of science or technology; among the few introduced before the nineteenth century may be mentioned stenography, stentorian, stereometry, stigma, stigmatize.

Among the words of historical importance treated in this section may be mentioned steelyard[1], sterling, steward. Several of the articles, e.g. steelbow, step sb. and vb., sterling, stew sb.[1], contain etymological data not found in previous English Dictionaries.
